Steam Distillation

This is the most common and traditional method:

- Harvesting Flowers: Fresh, fragrant petals of roses or orange blossoms are carefully picked at their peak bloom to maximize aroma and oil content.
- Preparation: The flowers are gently cleaned to remove dirt and impurities.
- Distillation Process: Flowers are placed in a distillation apparatus where steam passes through the plant material.

- Condensation: The steam carrying the essential oils and aromatic compounds condenses back into liquid.
- Separation: The resulting distillate separates into layers?essential oil at the top, water (hydrosol or floral water) at the bottom.
- Collection: The floral water is collected, filtered, and stored in airtight bottles to preserve its fragrance.

Hydrodistillation

Similar to steam distillation but involves boiling the flowers directly in water:

- The flowers are submerged in boiling water.
- The steam carries the aromatic compounds.
- The condensate is collected, and the floral water is separated as before.

Quality Considerations

- Purity: Authentic, high-quality rose water and orange blossom water should be free from additives, alcohol, or synthetic fragrances.
- Source: Look for products derived from organic, freshly harvested flowers.
- Price: Genuine floral waters may be pricier due to labor-intensive extraction and quality control.
